Crooked River: The Creation and Preservation of Tuzigoot National Monument and Heritage Tourism in the Verde Valley is an administrative history chronicling the decision by local residents, authorities, and the United Verde Copper Company during the Great Depression to enable archaeologists from the University of Arizona to excavate a site in Clarkdale, Arizona. This is a layered study that strives to reveal the interplay of natural resources with human agency, Verde Valley values, and the way they shift over time from occupation to abandonment, from primarily extraction to conservation, and from heavy industry to heritage tourism.
